[37].

There are an increasing number of anti-social behaviours in recent years; People generally believe that the society is to blame.

What do you think the causes are and who is responsible for this?

It is certainly true that one can encounter anti-social behavior more frequently than it was before. Many people even claim that the society itself is accountable for this unfortunate situation.

There are several causes for anti-social behaviors to merge into our lives than ever before. First and foremost reason is that, human population is growing rapidly. That means, more people are engaging in illegal activities and revealing their anti-social behaviors. Secondly, in my opinion, economic downturns and the rising unemployment correlate with an increasing number of anti-social behaviors. For example, in a financially prosperous society, it is not as common to encounter anti-social behavior as in undeveloped nations. In addition to that, an unjust court system can also be one of the reasons why some people tend to be anti-social. Because unfair trials may develop a hostile mentality inside society.

On the other hand, anti-social behaviors develop through social interaction within the family and community. In other words, the way children are raised can drastically affect their future social well-being. However, it is not hard to expect someone who has been abused in childhood to be anti-social. Since the impact of child traumatic stress can last well beyond childhood, it can be said that, person's upbringing is a critical process in terms of eliminating anti-social behaviors inside society. Moreover, drug addiction and alcohol abuse are also prominent reasons for developing anti-social behaviors. Due to the fact that they can affect the brain and behavior of consumers, it would make them unaware of the repercussions of their actions. Consequently, leading them to commit crimes.

In conclusion, it could be argued that society is responsible for a rising number of anti-social behaviors. The way I see it, those behaviors start from families and develop in society because of issues like financial instability, unjust court system and more. But I believe this issue can be tackled if we address it properly.